

Admission to universities in Western countries has become one step closer, the standardized test for proficiency in the school program SAT (Scholastic assessment test) can now be taken online. This was reported by CollegeBoard, the institution responsible for administering this exam. According to the organizers, the pilot launch of the digital version of the exam showed the same accuracy as the paper test, but at the same time the time required and the volume of texts in the academic reading section were reduced. Also among the updates is an online calculator that allows you to build graphs. According to the CollegeBoard study, the electronic exam was less stressful and “less intimidating” for students and made it easier to focus on the task. In addition, this approach allows you to reduce the likelihood of write-off to a minimum, because The assignments will be different for each test taker. After 98 years of “filling in the circles” on the answer form, students have the opportunity to take the coveted exam faster, more calmly, and remotely and in electronic format. The new version of the world-famous test is expected to be more effective and the results more accurate.
