

Initially, it was planned to introduce the new product on February 14, but due to the celebration of the Chinese New Year, the release was postponed to the following week.

According to updated information, NVIDIA has split the launch into two parts: cards with a recommended price (MSRP) and models with non-standard pricing.

The first reviews of MSRP cards will appear on February 19, and the next day, February 20, reviews of non-standard models will be available, and they will go on sale immediately.

It should be noted that the RTX 5070 Ti will not receive a Founders Edition version, which means that all available cards will be released by NVIDIA's partners.

It is not yet known when NVIDIA will introduce the RTX 5070 without the Ti suffix. However, gamers are already showing great interest in this series, which may prompt AMD to accelerate the launch of the competing Radeon RX 9070 lineup.