

Australian renowned actress Cate Blanchett opened up about her future plans in a recent interview. The two-time Oscar winner declared her intention to step away from acting. She mentioned that stepping back from acting will allow her to accomplish many other goals in life.

Cate Blanchett stated, "Every time I talk about this, my family rolls their eyes, but I'm serious about stepping away from acting. There are many things I want to achieve in my life." She also emphasized her desire to engage in various projects and explore new opportunities beyond acting.

In recent years, Blanchett has appeared in several prominent films and theatrical performances. She played the lead role in Anton Chekhov's play "The Seagull" and worked on several new films. Additionally, she is involved in producing and acting in the comedy film "Alpha Gang."

Blanchett also spoke candidly about the challenges of fame. She noted that adapting to celebrity status took her a long time, and she often felt "on the periphery" in society. She stated her interest in exploring diverse environments without the expectation of being accepted or rejected.

Cate Blanchett's decision to leave acting may be a significant loss for the film industry. However, her new plans and projects may open fresh paths in her creative journey.
