

Turkmen and Chinese scientists focused on environmental issues and held an extensive meeting. During the meeting, they mainly discussed the work directions of scientific centers in both countries and laid the foundation for joint research.

The Chinese delegation, led by Professor Abuduwayli Jilili, aimed to make this scientific visit both interesting and meaningful. Scientists primarily shared new ideas and experiences, outlining future steps for collaborative projects.

As part of the meeting, scientists reviewed research and experimental sites. Among them was the “Karrakül” site, located in the Central Karakum Desert.

This scientific cooperation opens up new opportunities for tackling environmental challenges, allowing the two countries to merge their expertise. The Karakum winds pave the way for new scientific discoveries!
