

Players signed up for Battlefield Beta, and received an invitation to the new Skate test

Electronic Arts announced the record activity around the new part of Skate: more than a million people signed up for the playout.

However, soon social networks filled posts from perplexing users – many players claimed that they were not registered at all for the game test about skaters. Instead, they expected Beta a new Battlefield.

As it turned out, EA could use data with Battlefield Labs – a portal for registration in the tests of the upcoming shooter.

Hello, skate. Insider!

We're gearing up for our next playtest, and it's going to be a big one! We have an exciting new update dropping in July with fresh challenges, content, and gameplay improvements.

Want to play with your friends and family? Now is your chance to invite them too!

Note: All skate. Insiders must complete the RSVP, whether you've played before, are playing in the current playtest now, or haven't played yet. By completing this RSVP, you are ensuring we capture your most recent info when playtesting starts.

Playground

Users claim that they indicated only interest in Battlefield, but were automatically added to the Skate test list. Some ironically write: "I was waiting for the war, but I got a skate."

This situation caused dissatisfaction and suspicions that EA decided to promote Skate through the expectations of fans of another franchise. At the same time, the exact release date of the new Skate is still unknown. It is expected that the game will be released until the end of 2025.