

Gmail will begin to notify the sender in case of reaction to his message

Insiders from Android Authority, when studying the code base of the last update of the Gmail application, noticed a code indicating several new functions, one of which is a notification of the sender's message reaction.

The function in question, as insiders note, is a notice of the reaction to the message using Emoji. Currently, the sender will not find out if someone answers the received message using Emoji. A new setting called "Chat reactions" will allow Gmail to inform the sender, "when someone likes, laughs or meets in other quick ways."

It emphasizes that Google seeks to make Gmail a real universal messenger, and not just a mailbox. The indicated innovations are just filed into the logic of the conversion of the service with full -fledged interaction in the chat. This and other functions are designed to make Gmail more convenient for communication.
